Liverpool a été démunie de son statut convoité de patrimoine mondial après que l'UNESCO ait accusé les années de développement d'avoir créé une perte irréversible de la valeur historique de ses quais Victoriens.

Les membres des Nations Unies au patrimoine ont conclu pendant une réunion en Chine mercredi que la "valeur universelle remarquable" des quais de Liverpool a été entravée par des nouveaux bâtiments, y compris le nouveau stade coûtant 500 millions de livres sterling du club de football Everton. La décision est comme une humiliation pour la ville, et accorde à Liverpool l'innombrable distinction d'être seulement le troisième lieu à perdre ce statut en presque cinquante ans.

Liverpool a profité du statut de patrimoine mondial de l'UNESCO depuis 2004 - le plaçant à côté du Taj Mahal et de la Grande Muraille de Chine - comme reconnaissance pour son rôle de grande puissance d'échange durant l'Empire Britannique et la beauté architecturale de ses quais. La menace de se voir retirer le titre a plané au-dessus de Liverpool ^{depuis 2012} alors que l'UNESCO a prévenu que le développement avait modifié le paysage urbain de façon significative et détruisait la valeur de l'héritage de ses quais.

Le comité des Nations Unies a dit du développement qu'il avait mené à une "sérieuse détérioration et une perte irréversible" à la remarquable valeur universelle de la région ainsi qu'une "perte significative de son authenticité et de son intégrité." Il a dit que

Le résultat de ces projets a été une détérioration des quais en ce qu'ils ont perdu les caractéristiques grâce auxquelles ils avaient été reconnu comme patrimoine mondial en 2004.

The huge American online payment company Paypal announced that it was going to authorize its users in the United Kingdom to buy, own and sell cryptocurrency on the payment platform for the first time in its history. Its customers will be able to choose between four types of cryptocurrency: bitcoin, ether, litecoin and cash bitcoin.

A new feature will be added to the Paypal platform, it will display cryptocurrency prices in real time and include information about cryptocurrency along with the potential risks.

This new feature will begin to be accessible this week, and will be available both on the Paypal app and website. The giant company stated that it hoped it would contribute to improving the understanding of the cryptocurrency's functioning.

The cryptocurrency's popularity over the past few years, despite their volatility and the worries regarding their impact on the environment.

The pandemic has sped up the numerical change and the innovation of every single aspect of our lives, including money becoming numerical, along with a greater use of numerical financial services by customers.

Is it legitimate to have British and American students pay for their higher education?

During the pandemic, students were on lockdown and couldn't go to school, and they found it unfair to pay tens of thousands of dollars a year to study without being allowed to go to school.

To begin with, higher education has to be paid by students in the United States and in the United Kingdom. One could understand how governments cannot fund everything. Moreover, charging the students for their tuition might even be productive as it could motivate them to work harder not to have to pay for another year if they ^{ever} failed their exams.

However, higher education is overly expensive, and most students cannot afford to go to their dream college, no matter how hard they work for it. Only a few scholarships are granted, mostly to sportsmen, and students have to pay their debt back for years. As an example, former American president Barack Obama once said that when he had been elected, years after graduating college, he still hadn't paid his entire debt back. Only wealthy students can afford such colleges as the ones from the Ivy League, and recruiters would rather employ someone who went to Brown University or Oxford University than someone who went to some community college.

Thus, while I don't think governments could pay for everyone's tuition, less wealthy students should be helped in order to have the same chances as the others, and not to have to work twice as hard to get just as much when it comes to jobs or incomes.
